Homelessness 1/

Homelessness has been a topic of considerable discussion in the media recently. Elizabeth Barrett's February 7th letter to the editor expressed alarm that there were 600 homeless school children and that the BOE budget must be increased to address this "crisis." "[D}ozens" of these homeless students, she wrote, "sleep in vehicles, tents or abandoned buildings." But the "crisis" of homeless students that Ms. Barrett describes does not exist. The number of homeless students reported by the BOE presents a totally misleading picture. There are not 600, or dozens, or even one child in the county that is unsheltered. And whenever such a situation does occur, housing is promptly provided.

Currently, Frederick County Public Schools(FCPS) reports that there are 654 "homeless" students in Frederick County this school year. However, this number results from a very broad definition of "homeless," and it is a cumulative number that counts every student who may have qualified as "homeless" (under their broad definition) even for one day. The FCPS definition of "homeless" includes people that are in adequate, but temporary housing. If "homeless" were defined to count only those who lived on the street, in a car, or in a tent, then the number would be much less—probably 0. The Frederick Community Action Agency (FCAA) annually makes an actual count of people not living in homes (a different definition of "homeless"). In 2013, that number was 275, of which 65 were children. Of the 65 children, 15 were in emergency housing and 50 were in transitional housing. There were no "unsheltered" children/students at that point in time.

I chaired a recent Synergies Committee Meeting in which representatives of the County Government, BOE, FCPS, FCAA, the City of Brunswick and Mission of Mercy were present to discuss "homelessness" issues. Mike Spurrier, Director of the FCAA, explained that the various agencies in the county work together to address homelessness. FCAA provides emergency and temporary housing. The Religious Coalition operates the cold weather shelter and provides other emergency housing. The Mission of Mercy, Rescue Mission, Advocates for the Homeless, and various county departments are also equipped to provide emergency housing. In the aftermath of the recent ice storm, volunteer fire houses and the Senior Center on Taney Avenue have also been available to provide housing for the homeless.

The result of all this is the County does provide emergency housing for any and all students who may become homeless.

At the recent Synergies Committee Meeting, Pat Rosensteel, Director of Frederick County Citizen Services, was tasked to coordinate with FCPS, the City of Frederick and other municipalities, and the various services organizations (FCAA, Religious Coalition, etc.) in establishing an improved communication network so that we can work together even better in providing housing for children whenever homeless situations may develop.

It is critical that the Frederick community continues to promptly address student homelessness whenever it occurs and as soon as it occurs. But we currently do this well. There is no crisis of homeless students that would require additional funds for FCPS.

1/ When the FNP ran this piece on February 21, 2014, they changed the title to "No Students in Frederick County Are Homeless." I promptly submitted a follow-up piece to FNP to correct the false statement they inserted. That letter is shown below and was published on February 25, 2014.

FNP's title edit created a misstatement

The FNP editors changed the title of my opinion piece on homelessness in a way that misstated and misrepresented what I wrote.

The letter which I submitted to FNP and which was printed on February 21st was titled by me as "Homelessness." For some reason the FNP editors changed the title to read: "No students in Frederick County are homeless." But there are three problems with this editorial title change: First, the statement is not correct; second, the title statement is not an accurate statement of what I wrote in the letter; and third, I did not make that statement, and I did not approve of changing the title from what I proposed.

In my letter, I clearly stated that the FCPS has identified 654 homeless students this year. Then I stated that the Community Action Agency identified 65 homeless children in its "point in time" count done in 2013, but all of these were in emergency or transitional housing. Never did I state that there were no homeless students in Frederick County.

What I did state was that there was no evidence to support the statement by another writer that there were "dozens" of students living in "tents, cars and abandoned buildings." I also stated that "there is no crisis of homeless students that required additional funds for FCPS." But I never stated that there were no homeless students in Frederick County.

To make matters worse, after the FNP editors put an erroneous title above my letter, then two days later (February 23rd) the editors printed harsh criticisms of my letter, prominently identifying it again by the false title that they had used for it. This is a significant misrepresentation: The editors printed statements criticizing me for stating that there are no homeless students, when I never said that.
